

Notes From IT: How Do I Know If I've Been Hacked?

There is a value to everything that you do online, from social networking, to banking and shopping. If one of your accounts is compromised, it can be used across the web. While social media is less likely to contain your credit card information, there are other ways a bad guy could cause you harm when hacking your account such as posting compromising messages that could embarrass you.

The clearest sign that you've been hacked is noticing that something has changed. Facebook and Google will send notifications and emails alerting that there have been attempts to access your account. If you have not changed your password or have not entered it incorrectly but you are getting a notification, get in to your account and change your password immediately! Also, regularly check your bank account to make sure there are no suspicious purchases. Banks and credit card companies usually have procedures in place to spot unusual activity, but if you are concerned, reach out to those entities.

If you have been hacked, contact the company to recover your account. Below are a few sites that can help:

- Facebook: <https://www.facebook.com/help/community/>
- Google: <https://accounts.google.com/signin/v2/recoveryidentifier?flowName=GlifWebSignIn&flowEntry=ServiceLogin>
- Netflix: <https://help.netflix.com>

Finally, if you have been hacked on one account, check your other accounts and change your password. Use different usernames and passwords on your accounts to make it more difficult to be hacked.

Stay healthy and safe!
