Notes from IT: Physical Security

Most people focus on phishing emails and software vulnerabilities when they think about cybersecurity. However, physically accessing someone's workstation is a simple way to infiltrate a network.

Consider the following when evaluating your workstation security efforts:

Unlocked Desktops

Lock your computer when you step away from your work area. Leaving it unlocked and unattended gives others the potential to access your work computer without your knowledge, potentially taking what they want without your consent.

COMMAND OPTION

Sticky Notes

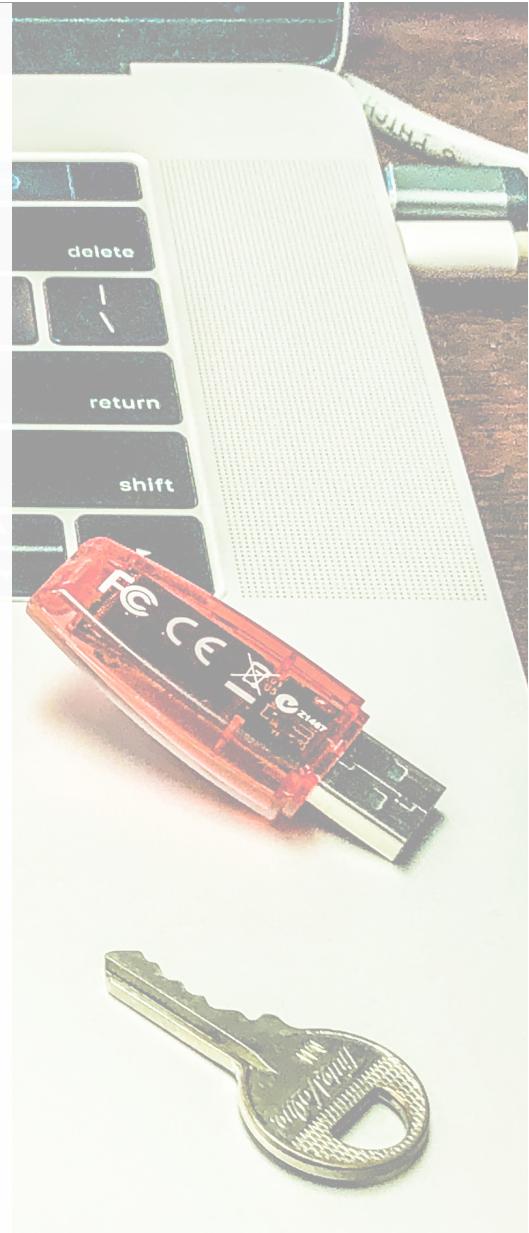

Never leave confidential information, such as passwords or other sensitive information, on sticky notes in your work area. Such information is easily visible to anyone who walks past or looks over your shoulder.

Flash Drives

If you come across an unfamiliar flash drive, do not use it. Hackers may leave malware-ridden USB drives at places of business. These devices may look innocent and harmless, so you may be tempted to pick them up. Do not use them, as they can have devastating effects when inserted into a computer.

By following these guidelines, you can reduce the risk of a hacker exploiting your workstation.
